

Migrant Bird Records for Saint Lucia, West Indies

C. Lyndon John

December 2004

Introduction

Migrant birds constitute an enriching and yet transient element to St. Lucia's biodiversity. For the fortunate few who are aware of St. Lucia's "native" birds, the migratory birds add an interesting and somewhat mysterious element to our wildlife. Their stopover appearances around home gardens, shorelines or water treatment ponds during their southbound journeys from North America to the Caribbean and beyond has prompted the occasional curious phone call to the Forestry Department by individuals seeking to identify them. Far from being considered a foreign element, such migratory birds should be regarded as an indigenous part of St. Lucia's wildlife and appreciated as such. Very few St. Lucians are aware of the swallows, sandpipers, warblers and the wild ducks that journey over thousands of miles from their summer breeding range to our shores to escape the cold northern winters. Many strictly associate such birds with North America or Europe and yet our local names such as "canard sauvage" for the wild ducks, and the various "becassine" (sandpipers) seen along the beaches reflect our longstanding knowledge of these birds as part of our natural heritage.

In the last century almost a hundred migratory species have been recorded in St. Lucia and therefore they constitute the majority of our avian diversity. It has been noted that:

"the number of vagrants¹ that reach St. Lucia in the autumn are a major component (39%) of its avifauna. This is not surprising given the prevailing direction of the fall migration from the Nearctic and St. Lucia's position relative to the major continental land masses." (Keith, 1997)

Many of these birds are either fully protected or partially protected under the Wildlife Protection Act (1980). However, over this period of time, St. Lucia has undergone rapid land use change and consequently, former important wildlife habitat sites have been converted to alternate use and are essentially lost to our feathered sojourners during their long trips. Sites such as the Reduit Swamp and the Sans Soucis mangroves are just a few of the noteworthy examples of conversion.

This trend in land use change has unfortunately impacted negatively on the survivability of the migratory birds that depend on the various pockets of habitat for food and shelter during their southerly and northbound migration. There has been a marked decline over the past thirty years in the numbers of birds surviving the annual round trip between their breeding grounds in the continental North America and their wintering grounds in the Caribbean, Central and South America. The U. S. National Weather Service has noted a significant falloff since the 1960's in the waves of spring migrants returning to their breeding range. Species recorded in St. Lucia that have shown a marked decline include the American Redstart, Yellow billed Cuckoo, Rose breasted Grosbeak, Cape May Warbler and the Prothonotary Warbler.

¹ A vagrant is defined as a bird that occurs incidentally out of its normal distribution range. Birds may be blown off course during the passage of a storm or dislocated by settling on ships during their migration.

This loss of habitat through conversion is by no means restricted to St. Lucia and is truly a hemispherical issue as countries strive to develop and accommodate the pressures of our modern societies. What is of significance is the resulting overall impact of substantial regional losses in habitat availability and quality to these birds that have no regard for international boundaries or national wildlife policies. Migratory wildlife, be they birds or turtles, are increasingly being recognized as a challenge that requires creative national, regional and ultimately international solutions.

St. Lucia has responded to the challenge and is signatory to some of the international environmental agreements established to address such challenges. St. Lucia is signatory to the United Nations Convention on Biodiversity (CBD) and the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands. As signatory to the Ramsar Convention, St. Lucia listed the Mankòtè Mangrove and Savannes Bay as its designated Ramsar wetland sites of international importance, both of which are significant to migratory birds.

This study seeks to accomplish a number of basic objectives. It seeks to:

- identify the migratory and vagrant birds recorded in St. Lucia. This record is the result of personal field observations, literature review and the records of colleagues and birding enthusiasts visiting St. Lucia. Far from being a comprehensive study on birds of St. Lucia, it is mainly an attempt to incorporate recent migrant bird observations in our archives on St. Lucian avifauna and to contribute to our efforts at biodiversity conservation.²
- develop a baseline in the numbers of the migrant bird species observed, locations and time of the year. There is a paucity of this kind of data for St. Lucia and the Eastern Caribbean in general.

Biodiversity conservation challenge

St. Lucia is no different from the rest of the region in its efforts at confronting the challenge of achieving sustainable development while securing its natural resources. However, sustainable development can only be achieved on the basis of informed decision making. Decision making under circumstances where there is a lack of data leads to an uninformed position and a lack of an awareness of possible options. This is particularly crucial to the decision making process relating to land use and land use change. In many instances, land use decisions seldom take into account the ecological value of such lands. Very often areas that are deemed suitable for “development”, have been targeted because development interests and authorities generally perceive them to be “wasteland.” Regionally, this has resulted in reduced habitat for migratory birds as mangroves and other forms of coastal wild spaces are put into alternate land use. There is a need to sustain an annual inventory of visiting migratory species, their habitat locations, and their numbers. Such information can assist in establishing the biodiversity value of such sites which should be factored into the decision making process regarding land use. It can be instrumental in prioritising sites of key importance while relegating those of lower significance to development type purposes.

Public interest

Generally public interest in the wild spaces and wildlife of St. Lucia has waned and there is a need to rekindle it or else a generation will arise that will underestimate the value of these resources and jeopardize their existence. St. Lucia's wildlife constitutes a rich part of the nation's heritage and the loss of these resources can only serve to impoverish all. It is significant that a bird, the St. Lucia Parrot is one of the national symbols and the successful national environmental education drive undertaken by the Forestry Department during the 1980's was done under the banner of the St. Lucia Parrot as a flagship species.

Such values can serve as the basis for stimulating interest in amateur wildlife research of the kind formerly conducted by civil society groups like the St. Lucia Naturalists Society (currently defunct) and the St. Lucia National Trust. It presents an opportunity for young people involved in the various youth groups (e.g. Scout Association, Cadets, Girl Guides Association) to gain valuable knowledge and experience if conservation values are included in their charters and their efforts and achievements of scientific study are rewarded.

Migrant Bird research

What records should be kept

Annual winter and spring season records of migratory species arrivals should be maintained. Specifically records should consist of:

Data to be recorded

- Observer (s) names
- Observation date
- Species observed
- Number of individual birds per species
- Duration of stay

Habitat Information

- Location
- Habitat type (e.g. pond, mangrove, dry forest)
- Vegetation description
- Perceived threats (e.g. industrial, domestic, or agricultural related impacts)

Which areas should be targeted for study

Bird watching can be carried out in a variety of locations and some migratory birds are observed in backyard gardens, man made wetlands (e.g. waste water treatment ponds) and urbane environs. This study gives a fair indication of locations across St. Lucia where birds have been consistently recorded. Habitat types tend to be; marshes, ponds, mangroves, beaches, coastal scrub forests and montane forests. Significant sites include: Grand Anse, Eau Piquant (commonly known as Boriel's Pond), Savannes Bay and Mankoté Mangrove (both are designated Ramsar Wetlands of International Significance), Gros Islet (e.g. Pigeon Point), Maria Islands, La Sourciere, Anse des Sable, Hewannora ponds, Louvette, Frigate Island, Scorpion Island, Fous Island, Point du Cap.

When should censusing be done

Observations should preferably span the time period covering the fall to spring migration period (September to May). Photographs or specimens that have succumbed to death by natural causes would support record substantiation (e.g. age, disease).

Acknowledgements

Special thanks to Christopher Cox, Donald Anthony, Stephen Lesmond, Alwin Dornelly, Robert Devaux, Wayne Burke, Moses Wilfred, Cassian Henry, Bertrand Jn Baptiste, all fellow wildlife researchers and bird watching enthusiasts who during their visits to St. Lucia took the time to call, e-mail or posted copies of their pictures and field notes or otherwise sent in their observations. I had the pleasure of conducting field research or touring with some of the contributors including: James Dawson, James Gilardi, Noel Snyder, Robert Norton, E. Benito-Espinal, P.W. Smith, Armos Hill, and Allan Keith, a special thanks to you also. I hope this contribution will stimulate additional interest and research in migrant bird activity in the Eastern Caribbean.
